

Carrie Hammerman is a Policy and Development Analyst, involved with both project and development work. She engages in policy research and analysis, group facilitation and coordination, writing and editing of reports, and proposal development.

Carrie has been involved with the welfare-to-work efforts for the State of Michigan, as well as a collaborative project with the Aspen Institute to gauge the presence and level of interest in microenterprise in the state. In addition, she has helped facilitate a nationwide grant program for the Microsoft corporation to bring information technology training to low-wage workers via Workforce Investment Boards (WIBs). For this project, Carrie has served as a liaison between Microsoft and the WIBs and has collaborated with team members on managing the project and its evaluation.

Prior to joining CSW, Carrie worked as Policy Analyst in a nonprofit information technology policy organization, designing and carrying out research projects and proposals, serving as organizational spokesperson, and coordinating events and workshops. She also has experience in the public sector with positions held in federal, county, and city governments.

Carrie has a Masters of Science in Information and a Masters of Public Policy from the University of Michigan.
